Former Harvard researcher to lead company's global clinical team

Dr. Das, a British nephrologist and a previous Harkness Fellow in Health Care Policy and Practice based at Harvard University, will lead DaVita's international clinical operations and its global team of chief medical officers, succeeding Mahesh Krishnan, M.D., who has served in the post since 2015.

"I'm thrilled to be joining DaVita, particularly at a time when its international operations are growing and strengthening," said Dr. Das. "There is great opportunity ahead to further evolve the excellent patient care we provide globally and provide a nurturing working environment for our teammates."

In 2017, he was commissioned by the CEO of England's National Health Service to redesign dialysis provision for patients in secure environments. More recently, he has worked on the development of systems engineering as a means for delivering high-value care as a member of the Quality Improvement Faculty at the Royal College of Physicians of London.

"We're truly excited to have someone of Dr. Das' caliber succeed Dr. Krishnan, who has played a crucial role in evolving our global clinical operations and infrastructure over the past three years," said Robert Lang, president and CEO for DaVita's international business. "Dr. Das' expertise in clinical systems improvement will be of considerable benefit as we continue to grow and look to further deliver on our commitment to providing differentiated care to our patients around the world."

Dr. Das will commence his role in a transitional capacity with Dr. Krishnan, who will take up a new role with DaVita Kidney Care in the U.S. in the coming months.
